American system while attending school in Honolulu and on her visits to this country.

With this knowledge of the system, she decided she could best help her people by running for office. She is the only woman ever to be elected to the Lower House.

And she was defeated running for her second term. But determined, she stumped the island and campaigned over the radio, and in December 1956 she was re-elected. This time defeating three men by a wide majority.

Most women in her country are interested mostly in their homes. Some of the men work but others provide thatched homes and food for their families without holding a job. Food is plentiful in the islands, so there is no real reason for the natives to work, she says.

Women also get along without many of the so-called American luxuries such as washing machines, refrigerators, dishwashers and other conveniences.

However, she said, most of the thatched huts now are wired for electricity and have electric lights.

The wealthy islanders live in homes much like those in this country, as do United States government employees stationed there.

Mrs. Reid expects her husband to join her this summer and in September they will return to Pago Pago, and she will again assume her role as legislator.
